light of the clear intention of the respondent to deprive CME of its contractual rights. In Enron v Argentina the Tribunal denied the existence of arbitrariness since the measures adopted were what the Government believed and understood was the best response to the unfolding crisis. By contrast, in Occidental v Ecuador, the Tribunal determined that the standard was violated to some extent not because of certain impugned actions but because of the 'very confusion and lack of clarity that resulted in some form of arbitrariness, even if not intended'.

cc. Relationship to fair and equitable treatment and to customary international law

Given the nature and the breadth of the concept of arbitrariness, it is not surprising that it has been said that any arbitrary action will also violate the standard of fair and equitable treatment. The matter has surfaced especially under the NAFTA which contains a clause on fair and equitable treatment and no explicit prohibition of arbitrary treatment. Tribunals established under NAFTA have considered that arbitrary treatment also violates the requirement of fair and equitable treatment. The tendency to merge the two standards can also be found in the application of bilateral treaties.

Despite this tendency, there are weighty arguments in favour of treating the two standards as conceptually different. There is no good reason why treaty drafters would use two different terms when they mean one and the same thing. Equally, it is difficult to see why one standard should be part of the other when the text of the treaties lists them side by side as two standards without indicating that one is merely an emanation of the other. Of course, there may be considerable overlap and one particular set of facts may violate both the FET standard and the rule against arbitrary or discriminatory treatment.

A number of tribunals have, in fact, examined compliance with the standards of fair and equitable treatment and unreasonable or discriminatory treatment separately. Although there is often no explicit discussion of the relationship of the two concepts, their sequential and separate treatment in awards indicates that the tribunals regarded them as distinct standards.

The Tribunal in Duke Energy v Ecuador had to interpret a provision in the Ecuador-US BIT that afforded protection against impairment by arbitrary or discriminatory measures. The respondent argued that this was part of the FET standard; however, the Tribunal disagreed and said:

In view of the structure of the provisions of the BIT, the Tribunal has difficulty following Ecuador’s argument that there is only one concept of fair and equitable treatment which encompasses a non-impairment notion. The Tribunal will thus make a separate determination to decide whether the contested measures were arbitrary.

As with all broad standards in BITs, the relationship of the rule to customary international law may be raised. The traditional understanding of the customary minimum standard seems to have covered actions deemed arbitrary. It would follow that the treaty standard against arbitrariness is also covered by customary international law.

(b) Discriminatory measures

Discrimination can take a number of forms. It can be based on race, religion, political affiliation, disability, and a number of other criteria. In the context of the treatment of foreign investment, the most frequent problem is discrimination on the basis of nationality. Consequently, most of the practice dealing with discrimination focuses on nationality. In fact, discrimination on the basis of nationality is addressed in investment treaties by way of two specific standards: national treatment and MFN treatment. These standards are dealt with in separate sections of this chapter. But this does not mean that the issue of discrimination is necessarily restricted to nationality.
